Venturing out of painting, Milwaukee-based artist Reginald Baylor has shifted his focus to building brands. After realizing the time it took him to finish a painting that most people couldn't afford, Baylor turned to the examples of past business-minded artists like Takashi Murakami, Kehinde Wiley, and Andy Warhol for the inspiration to imagine manufacturing creativity.

In 2018, in order to advance the creative industry, he relocated Reginald Baylor Studio to Walker's Point where it now targets its energies on the design and development of brands. The diverse brands produced at Reginald Baylor Studio sell products and produce short films, while co-branding and offering specialized design services.

Please join the Union Art Gallery for this innovative exhibition, focusing on new models of creative output and the business of design, and showing what creativity can do for the community.

The First Year Program in Art and Design at UWM's Peck School of the Arts prepares students to be creative, engaged and ready to advance in their chosen areas of study. The first year is a time of artistic and personal development during which students choose their areas of concentration and begin to see themselves becoming practitioners in their field. The Union Art Gallery's First Year Exhibition is an opportunity for these students to showcase the work they have created during this process. Join us in celebrating the work of these talented artists.

This dual exhibition explores collaborative approaches to photography through the presentation of process, research and pedagogy alongside striking original works by two Midwest-based photographers. Collaboration: A Potential History of Photography is an educational project by a group of artists, scholars and teachers - including Ariella Azoulay, Wendy Ewald, Susan Meiselas, Leigh Raiford and Laura Wexler - that hopes to initiate conversations around the idea of photography as a means of collaboration. As an extension, Explorative Collaborations of Barbara Ciurej & Lindsay Lochman showcases the results of their particular collaborative process.

We are happy to present Collaborative Lens in partnership with the Milwaukee Art Museum's exhibition Susan Meiselas: Through a Woman's Lens on view at the Milwaukee Art Museum April 17 – August 2, 2020.
